Under the one word, house, are included the school house, the almshouse, the jail, the tavern, the dwelling house; and the meanest shed or cave in which men live, contains the elements of all these. But no where on the earth stands the entire and perfect house. The Parthenon, St. Peter’s, the Gothic minster, the palace, the hovel, are but imperfect executions of an imperfect idea. Who would dwell in them? Perhaps to the eye of the gods, the cottage is more holy than the Parthenon, for they look down with no especial favor upon the shrines formally dedicated to them, and that should be the most sacred roof which shelters most of humanity. Surely, then, the gods who are most interested in the human race preside over the Tavern, where especially men congregate. Methinks I see the thousand shrines erected to hospitality shining afar in all countries, as well Mahometan and Jewish, as Christian, khans, and caravansaries, and inns, whither all pilgrims without distinction resort.

Likewise we look in vain east or west over the earth to find the perfect man; but each represents only some particular excellence. The Landlord is a man of more open and general sympathies, who possesses a spirit of hospitality which is its own reward, and feeds and shelters men from pure love of the creatures. To be sure, this profession is as often filled by imperfect characters, and such as have sought it from unworthy motives, as any other, but so much the more should we prize the true and honest Landlord when we meet with him.

Who has not imagined to himself a country inn, where the traveller shall really feel in, and at home, and at his public house, who was before at his private house; whose host is indeed a host, and a lord of the land, a self-appointed brother of his race; called to his place, beside, by all the winds of heaven and his good genius, as truly as the preacher is called to preach; a man of such universal sympathies, and so broad and genial a human nature, that he would fain sacrifice the tender but narrow ties of private friendship, to a broad, sunny, fair-weather-and foul friendship for his race; who loves men, not as a philosopher, with philanthropy, nor as an overseer of the poor, with charity, but by a necessity of his nature, as he loves dogs and horses; and standing at his open door from morning till night, would fain see more and more of them come along the highway, and is never satisfied. To him the sun and moon are but travellers, the one by day and the other by night; and they too patronise his house. To his imagination all things travel save his sign-post and himself; and though you may be his neighbor for years, he will show you only the civilities of the road. But on the other hand, while nations and individuals are alike selfish and exclusive, he loves all men equally; and if he treats his nearest neighbor as a stranger, since he has invited all nations to share his hospitality, the farthest travelled is in some measure kindred to him who takes him into the bosom of his family.

He keeps a house of entertainment at the sign of the Black Horse or the Spread Eagle, and is known far and wide, and his fame travels with increasing radius every year. All the neighborhood is in his interest, and if the traveller ask how far to a tavern, he receives some such answer as this: “Well, sir, there’s a house about three miles from here, where they haven’t taken down their sign yet; but it’s only ten miles to Slocum’s, and that’s a capital house, both for man and beast.” At three miles he passes a cheerless barrack, standing desolate behind its sign-post, neither public nor private, and has glimpses of a discontented couple who have mistaken their calling. At ten miles see where the Tavern stands,—really an entertaining prospect,—so public and inviting that only the rain and snow do not enter. It is no gay pavilion, made of bright stuffs, and furnished with nuts and gingerbread, but as plain and sincere as a... caravansary; located in no Tarrytown, where you receive only the civilities of commerce, and far in the fields it exercises a native hospitality, amid the fresh scent of new hay and raspberries, if it be summer time, and the tinkling of cow-bells from invisible pastures; for here is his sincerity and earnest, at least. It may not be here that the besoms are piled most—it is not here that they need to be, for dust will not settle on the kitchen floor more than in nature.

Hence it will not do for the Landlord to possess too fine a nature. He must have health above the common scions of life, subject to no modern fashionable diseases; but no taste, rather a vast relish or appetite. His sentiments on all subjects will be delivered as freely as the wind blows. There is nothing private, or individual in them, though still original, but they are public, and of the hue of the heavens over his house—a certain out-of-door obviousness and transparency by which he does, his manners are not to be complained of, though abstractly offensive, for it is what man does, and in him the race is exhibited. When he eats, he is liver and bowels, and the rattle of his digestive apparatus to the company, and so all admit the thing is done. He must have no idiosyncrasies, no particular habits or tendencies to this or that, but a general, uniform, and healthy development, such as his portly person indicates, offering himself equally on all sides to men. He is not one of your peaked and inhaunted men of genius, with particular talents and tastes, before, has one uniform relish, and taste which never aspires higher than a tavern sign, or the cut of a weathercock. The man of genius, like a dog, is liver and bowels, and the rattle of his digestive apparatus to the company, and so all admit the thing is done. He must have no idiosyncrasies, no particular habits or tendencies to this or that, but a general, uniform, and healthy development, such as his portly person indicates, offering himself equally on all sides to men. He is not one of your peaked and inhaunted men of genius, with particular talents and tastes. He has solved some of the problems of life. He comes in at his back door, holding a log fresh cut for the hearth upon his shoulder with one hand, while he foots the newly arrived traveller with the other.

Here at length we have free range, as not in palaces, nor cottages, nor temples, and intrude no where. All the mysteries of housekeeping are exhibited to the eyes of men, above and below, before and behind. This is the necessary way to live, men have confessed, in these days, and shall be. And why should we have any serious disgust at kitchens? Perhaps they are the holiest recess of the house. There is the hearth, after all, and the settle, and the faggots, and the kettle, and the cricket. We have pleasant reminiscences of these. They are the heart, the left ventricle, the very vital part of the house. Here the real and sincere life which we meet in the streets was actually fed and sheltered. Here burns the taper that cheers the house. Here the real and sincere life which we meet in the streets was actually fed and sheltered. Here burns the taper that cheers the house.
traveller. The mail might drive through his brain in the midst of his most lonely soliloquy, without disturbing his equanimity, provided it brought plenty of news and passengers. There can be no profanity where there is no face behind, and the whole world may see quite round him. Perchance his lines have fallen to him in duster places, and he has heroically sat down white two roads met, or at the Four Corners, or the Five Points, and his life is sublimely trivial for the good of men. The dust of travel blows ever in his eyes, and they preserve their clear, complacent look. The hourlies and half-hourlies, the duties and weeklies, whirl on well worn tracks, round and round his house, as if it were the goal in the stadium, and still he sits within in unruffled serenity, with no show of retreat. His neighbor dwells timidly behind a screen of poplars and willows, and a fence with sheafs of rattle over the door-step of the tavern, and he cracks his whip in the entry.

He entertains no private or individual in them, still original, but they are public, in the hue of the heavens over his head—a certain out-of-door obviousness and transparency not to be disputed.

The mail might drive through his brain in the midst of his most lonely soliloquy, without disturbing his equanimity, provided it brought plenty of news and passengers. There can be no profanity where there is no face behind, and the whole world may see quite round him. Perchance his lines have fallen to him in duster places, and he has heroically sat down white two roads met, or at the Four Corners, or the Five Points, and his life is sublimely trivial for the good of men. The dust of travel blows ever in his eyes, and they preserve their clear, complacent look. The hourlies and half-hourlies, the duties and weeklies, whirl on well worn tracks, round and round his house, as if it were the goal in the stadium, and still he sits within in unruffled serenity, with no show of retreat. His neighbor dwells timidly behind a screen of poplars and willows, and a fence with sheafs of rattle over the door-step of the tavern, and he cracks his whip in the entry.

He entertains no private or individual in them, still original, but they are public, in the hue of the heavens over his head—a certain out-of-door obviousness and transparency not to be disputed.

The mail might drive through his brain in the midst of his most lonely soliloquy, without disturbing his equanimity, provided it brought plenty of news and passengers. There can be no profanity where there is no face behind, and the whole world may see quite round him. Perchance his lines have fallen to him in duster places, and he has heroically sat down white two roads met, or at the Four Corners, or the Five Points, and his life is sublimely trivial for the good of men. The dust of travel blows ever in his eyes, and they preserve their clear, complacent look. The hourlies and half-hourlies, the duties and weeklies, whirl on well worn tracks, round and round his house, as if it were the goal in the stadium, and still he sits within in unruffled serenity, with no show of retreat. His neighbor dwells timidly behind a screen of poplars and willows, and a fence with sheafs of rattle over the door-step of the tavern, and he cracks his whip in the entry.

He entertains no private or individual in them, still original, but they are public, in the hue of the heavens over his head—a certain out-of-door obviousness and transparency not to be disputed.

The mail might drive through his brain in the midst of his most lonely soliloquy, without disturbing his equanimity, provided it brought plenty of news and passengers. There can be no profanity where there is no face behind, and the whole world may see quite round him. Perchance his lines have fallen to him in duster places, and he has heroically sat down white two roads met, or at the Four Corners, or the Five Points, and his life is sublimely trivial for the good of men. The dust of travel blows ever in his eyes, and they preserve their clear, complacent look. The hourlies and half-hourlies, the duties and weeklies, whirl on well worn tracks, round and round his house, as if it were the goal in the stadium, and still he sits within in unruffled serenity, with no show of retreat. His neighbor dwells timidly behind a screen of poplars and willows, and a fence with sheafs of rattle over the door-step of the tavern, and he cracks his whip in the entry.

He entertains no private or individual in them, still original, but they are public, in the hue of the heavens over his head—a certain out-of-door obviousness and transparency not to be disputed.

The mail might drive through his brain in the midst of his most lonely soliloquy, without disturbing his equanimity, provided it brought plenty of news and passengers. There can be no profanity where there is no face behind, and the whole world may see quite round him. Perchance his lines have fallen to him in duster places, and he has heroically sat down white two roads met, or at the Four Corners, or the Five Points, and his life is sublimely trivial for the good of men. The dust of travel blows ever in his eyes, and they preserve their clear, complacent look. The hourlies and half-hourlies, the duties and weeklies, whirl on well worn tracks, round and round his house, as if it were the goal in the stadium, and still he sits within in unruffled serenity, with no show of retreat. His neighbor dwells timidly behind a screen of poplars and willows, and a fence with sheafs of rattle over the door-step of the tavern, and he cracks his whip in the entry.

He entertains no private or individual in them, still original, but they are public, in the hue of the heavens over his head—a certain out-of-door obviousness and transparency not to be disputed.

The mail might drive through his brain in the midst of his most lonely soliloquy, without disturbing his equanimity, provided it brought plenty of news and passengers. There can be no profanity where there is no face behind, and the whole world may see quite round him. Perchance his lines have fallen to him in duster places, and he has heroically sat down white two roads met, or at the Four Corners, or the Five Points, and his life is sublimely trivial for the good of men. The dust of travel blows ever in his eyes, and they preserve their clear, complacent look. The hourlies and half-hourlies, the duties and weeklies, whirl on well worn tracks, round and round his house, as if it were the goal in the stadium, and still he sits within in unruffled serenity, with no show of retreat. His neighbor dwells timidly behind a screen of poplars and willows, and a fence with sheafs of rattle over the door-step of the tavern, and he cracks his whip in the entry.

He entertains no private or individual in them, still original, but they are public, in the hue of the heavens over his head—a certain out-of-door obviousness and transparency not to be disputed.

The mail might drive through his brain in the midst of his most lonely soliloquy, without disturbing his equanimity, provided it brought plenty of news and passengers. There can be no profanity where there is no face behind, and the whole world may see quite round him. Perchance his lines have fallen to him in duster places, and he has heroically sat down white two roads met, or at the Four Corners, or the Five Points, and his life is sublimely trivial for the good of men. The dust of travel blows ever in his eyes, and they preserve their clear, complacent look. The hourlies and half-hourlies, the duties and weeklies, whirl on well worn tracks, round and round his house, as if it were the goal in the stadium, and still he sits within in unruffled serenity, with no show of retreat. His neighbor dwells timidly behind a screen of poplars and willows, and a fence with sheafs of rattle over the door-step of the tavern, and he cracks his whip in the entry.

He entertains no private or individual in them, still original, but they are public, in the hue of the heavens over his head—a certain out-of-door obviousness and transparency not to be disputed.

The mail might drive through his brain in the midst of his most lonely soliloquy, without disturbing his equanimity, provided it brought plenty of news and passengers. There can be no profanity where there is no face behind, and the whole world may see quite round him. Perchance his lines have fallen to him in duster places, and he has heroically sat down white two roads met, or at the Four Corners, or the Five Points, and his life is sublimely trivial for the good of men. The dust of travel blows ever in his eyes, and they preserve their clear, complacent look. The hourlies and half-hourlies, the duties and weeklies, whirl on well worn tracks, round and round his house, as if it were the goal in the stadium, and still he sits within in unruffled serenity, with no show of retreat. His neighbor dwells timidly behind a screen of poplars and willows, and a fence with sheafs of rattle over the door-step of the tavern, and he cracks his whip in the entry.

He entertains no private or individual in them, still original, but they are public, in the hue of the heavens over his head—a certain out-of-door obviousness and transparency not to be disputed.

The mail might drive through his brain in the midst of his most lonely soliloquy, without disturbing his equanimity, provided it brought plenty of news and passengers. There can be no profanity where there is no face behind, and the whole world may see quite round him. Perchance his lines have fallen to him in duster places, and he has heroically sat down white two roads met, or at the Four Corners, or the Five Points, and his life is sublimely trivial for the good of men. The dust of travel blows ever in his eyes, and they preserve their clear, complacent look. The hourlies and half-hourlies, the duties and weeklies, whirl on well worn tracks, round and round his house, as if it were the goal in the stadium, and still he sits within in unruffled serenity, with no show of retreat. His neighbor dwells timidly behind a screen of poplars and willows, and a fence with sheafs of rattle over the door-step of the tavern, and he cracks his whip in the entry.

He entertains no private or individual in them, still original, but they are public, in the hue of the heavens over his head—a certain out-of-door obviousness and transparency not to be disputed.

The mail might drive through his brain in the midst of his most lonely soliloquy, without disturbing his equanimity, provided it brought plenty of news and passengers. There can be no profanity where there is no face behind, and the whole world may see quite round him. Perchance his lines have fallen to him in duster places, and he has heroically sat down white two roads met, or at the Four Corners, or the Five Points, and his life is sublimely trivial for the good of men. The dust of travel blows ever in his eyes, and they preserve their clear, complacent look. The hourlies and half-hourlies, the duties and weeklies, whirl on well worn tracks, round and round his house, as if it were the goal in the stadium, and still he sits within in unruffled serenity, with no show of retreat. His neighbor dwells timidly behind a screen of poplars and willows, and a fence with sheafs of rattle over the door-step of the tavern, and he cracks his whip in the entry.

He entertains no private or individual in them, still original, but they are public, in the hue of the heavens over his head—a certain out-of-door obviousness and transparency not to be disputed.
He is wiser than to contradict his guest in any case; he lets him go on, he lets him travel.
The latest sitter leaves him standing far in the night, prepared to live right on, while suns rise and set, and his “good-night” has as brisk a sound as his “good-morning;” and the earliest riser finds him tasting his liquors in the bar ere flies begin to buzz, with a countenance fresh as the morning star over the sanded floor,—and not as one who had watched all night for travellers.
And yet, if beds be the subject of conversation, it will appear that no man has been a sounder sleeper in his time.

Finally, as for his moral character, we do not hesitate to say, that he has no grain of vice or meanness in him, but represents just that degree of virtue which all men relish without being obliged to respect. He is a good man, as his bitters are good—an unquestionable goodness. Not what is called a good man,—good to be considered, as a work of art in galleries and museums,—but a good fellow, that is, good to be associated with. Who ever thought of the religion of an innkeeper—whether he was joined to the Church, partook of the sacrament, said his prayers, feared God, or the like? No doubt he has had his experiences, has felt a change, and is a firm believer in the perseverance of the saints. In this last, we suspect, does the peculiarity of his religion consist. But he keeps an inn, and not a conscience. How many fragrant charities, and sincere social virtues are implied in this daily offering of himself to the public. He cherishes good will to all, and gives the wayfarer as good and honest advice to direct him on his road, as the priest.

To conclude, the tavern will compare favorably with the church. The church is the place where prayers and sermons are delivered, but the tavern is where they are to take effect, and if the former are good, the latter cannot be bad.

THE FATHERLAND.

BY J. R. LOWELL.

Where is the true man’s fatherland? Is it where he by chance is born? Doth not the free-winged spirit scorn In such pent borders to be spanned? Oh yes, his fatherland must be As the blue heaven wide and free!

Is it alone where freedom is,
Where God is God and man is man?
Doth he not claim a broader span For the soul’s love of home than this?
Oh yes! his fatherland must be
As the blue heaven wide and free!

Where’er a human heart doth wear
Joy’s myrtle wreath, or sorrow’s gyves,
Where’er a human spirit strives
After a life more pure and fair,
There is the true man’s birthplace grand!
His is a world-wide fatherland!

Where’er a single slave doth pine,
Where’er one man may help another,—
Thank God for such a birthright, brother!
That spot of earth is thine and mine; There is the true man’s birthplace grand!
His is a world-wide fatherland!